A MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE SUIT.

The law gossip of the week concerns most especially those who go down to the sea in ships, and may serve as a warning lesson to those who prefer present security to future peace and happiness. A year or two ago, M. Malifaire, bonor, hope, and heir of a renowned calico printer, stocking maker, and night cap vendor of Rouen, set sail from Havre to proceed to Sydney in order to superintend the business which his father carried on in that place, and which the death of his partner had left without surveillance. One of those accidents which will happen, in spite of caution or compass, even to the most guarded course, to the rotten luck, as a matter of course, to the entire hapless in which M. Malifaire set sail—and on the inhospitable shore of Wallis's Island it was wrecked; everything lost but M. Malifaire, to whom everything was lost but honor. The plump merchant and defenceless state of the young man caused a great temptation to the dainty inhabitants of Wallis's Island, who have disgusted the missionaries by eating each other, and they carried him away to the chief's hut with loud shouts of triumph, and upon their shore.

The Christian Missionaries have not yet established the Maristes on the island. They work night and day without ceasing, and at the conversion of these savages, and have got as far as the prevention of infanticide for gastronomic purposes, which is a great step; but they have not as yet been able to inspire that wholesome dislike of human flesh which should certainly form the first step in every conversion to Christianity. The poor young man in his dilemma, appeared piteously to the reverend fathers; but they confessed that they possessed no influence; that they were barely tolerated and dare not interfere. The only resource to be expected was obtained by choosing a wife among the native women, and consenting to remain on the island forever. After much persuasion from the missionary he accepted the latter alternative, and the holy father, according to the custom of the nation, chose a bride for the young man, and took especial care to choose a good part, no less a one than a daughter of the chief. One thing, however, the father insisted on; the marriage should be solemnized seriously with Catholic rites; and at all events the bridegroom should be bound by proper registers, and not be permitted to treat the sacred ceremony with the same lightness as it is elsewhere.

Everything was consented to by the young man, who had grown attached to life by means of a good supper, and accordingly, on the next day the beautiful Suleta, all freshly trimmed from head to foot—her fair proportions undisturbed by ermine—was led to the altar of the Maristes by M. Malifaire. But, of course, our hero from Rouen had treated the whole thing as a little harmless expedient to keep a safe skin and began to look out for an opportunity of quitting the scene of his carnal felicity. Some months elapsed, however, before this opportunity occurred; but at length, one afternoon, wandering disconsolately on the beach, he described a vessel in the offing. It was an English vessel, whose boat's crew in answer to the signal of distress hoisted by the bridegroom, hastened to the rescue, and bore him off to the ship, without discovery on the part of the natives, who would have killed and eaten them all had they been aware of the treachery intended. M. Malifaire landed safe and sound at Havre only two months ago. He found that great changes had taken place in his father's household during his absence. An inheritance had fallen in—fortune had smiled most graciously upon the old man, and the son, after all his retrenchments and misery, returned to find himself the heir of a fortune he had never dreamed of. The first thing for a rich man in France to do, is, as we all know, to provide himself with a rich wife; the father began to look about him, and having found a suitable match, the parties were straightway brought forth to be married.

But now arose the difficulty—young Malifaire could not deny his marriage at Wallis's Island by a Catholic priest, according to every point of view, excepting the legal one point of the non-consent of the bridegroom. So, then, the father, who was served by a lawyer, upon the "Monsieur Suleta" to show cause why she should not be disposed of her title. Of course the whole affair was considered a mighty good joke by the gossips, and laughed at accordingly; for, of course, after the delay expired, no party could appear, judgment would go by default, and Malifaire would be free to marry whom he pleased. Thus did the affair stand until last week, when it was found that the father had died, and the son, after the death of the father, had been found dead, and the son, after the death of the father, had been found dead.
